"New Alchemy's Bioshelters combined passive solar architecture, agriculture and aquaculture systems to create an integrated sustainable food producing "living machine". The glazing or "skin" of the structure (The dome above, Ark below) allows energy as sunlight to penetrate. The plants use the light to photosynthesize. Much of the light is converted into heat energy. The glazing that allowed the energy sunlight to pass through readily blocks the energy as heat (different wavelength). This is the greenhouse effect that is, in fact, critical to maintaining the conditions necessary for life."

"They were a group of fifteen micro-parcels of land in Queens, left-over properties from an architect's drawing. One or two of the prize ones were a foot strip down somebody's driveway and a foot of sidewalk. And the others were curbstone and gutter space. What I basically wanted to do was to designate spaces that wouldn't be seen and certainly not occupied."
